Further, it is here that the author can convincingly show at least to this reader the strength of the entire premise of her book: even when Ronsard did not write love poetry in Petrarch's manner, his "reaction against the Petrarchan vein is attributed by the poet himself to his reading of Petrarch, not as a text but as a 'story'" This premise in turn allows Sturm-Maddox to highlight Ronsard's assertive reworking of the Petrarchan paradigm: rather than adapt to his model, he "changes his public reading of Petrarch to bring the two once again into conformity" Chapter 4 concentrates on a cluster of poems written "Sur la mort de Marie" which, as Sturm-Maddox notes at the beginning, begs to be read alongside Petrarch's poems in morte di Laura: "for Ronsard's collection of love poems in morte the recall in the second part of the Rime sparse was inevitable; it afforded the perfect model" Moreover, again the author reinforces such similarity by invoking The Dalton Boys: The Real Story of the Dalton Gang context of such poems, specifically, the atmosphere then prevailing at the French court. In a conversation with Nicholas Pym, her convictions become suspect-when Nicholas Pym asks Tess to explain her interest in the Baltics, Tom fills in the blanks, responding that his family has been personally affected.
